How to Help Your Child Recognize and Understand Jealousy

Alyson Jiron, Brooke Brogle & Jill Giacomini

“Jealousy is not fair! Jealousy is a normal emotion experienced by adults and children. Young children often do not have the skills or language to deal with this complex feeling. Many children deal with jealousy by acting out with challenging behavior such as tantrums, crying or hitting. Because your child may act out with anger, it can be difficult for you to respond to the true feelings of jealousy. When you teach your child to identify and respond to the true feelings of jealousy, you are doing more than making him feel better. You are also helping him learn to manage painful feelings and get along with others today and in the future. If your child knows that his feelings are normal and he is unique and valued for who he is, regardless of his toys or abilities, jealous feelings are less likely to escalate into destructive behaviors.

Try This at Home

- Notice and label your child’s feelings of jealousy. “I can see it makes you sad and jealous when I feed the baby. When the timer is up, you can choose an activity for just you and me! I love spending time with you.”
- Be sure to spend dedicated, quality time with your child. Every child needs someone who is crazy about him! Fifteen minutes of one-on-one time without the TV, computer or phone will help you to build a positive relationship, support his social and emotional development, and help him feel loved, competent and confident. Quality time can be reading a book, giving hugs and/or high fives, singing a song or letting your child be your special helper.
- Remember a time when you felt jealous and share it with your child. Discuss with him how you dealt with your feelings of jealousy.
- Acknowledge differences in people. Teach him that everyone is unique and has different strengths and struggles. For example, you could say, “Your daddy is really good at playing baseball. I really like to play but it is hard for me.” Or, “I see that some of those kids love playing with puzzles—others would rather play with the trains.”
- Focus on your child’s strengths. Tell your child the special things about him. “I love how you smile at the people in the store. It makes them happy.” Or, “It makes me happy to watch you build with blocks. You create amazing towers and tunnels.”

Practice at School

At school, teachers talk about and celebrate all kinds of differences. When children learn that our differences make us unique, they are less likely to feel jealous or compare themselves to other children and are more likely to feel proud of who they are. Teachers help children learn about diversity by reading stories, looking at pictures, or playing with toys that represent people from other countries or people with different abilities, beliefs or lifestyles.

The Bottom Line

When your child can understand and label his different feelings (sad, angry, jealous) it helps him to cope with emotion, understand others, and reduce challenging behavior. It is natural for him to feel jealous from time to time. Children can become jealous of a parent’s attention (e.g., new baby at home) or another child’s toys or abilities. Teaching your child to cope with jealous feelings will provide your child with a lifelong skill.
